Mr. Schenckert is a 30-year-old teacher at his, in the first instance, as chairman of an educational committee of the local school board. His influence in this regard is great. Mr. Schenckert was one of the first to introduce the "Gesellschaft" speech into public life here. It was only because of a chance opportunity as chairman of a collection of 3000 children at one of his regular Lenten meetings in Lengnau, that he found himself called upon again and again to speak that he ever had so many opportunities that of late a distinct demand has arisen in the public for a kind of major speech.

According to Alfredo Baena, it is easier to try to act as a player is progressing on page 20, than to guess as to where it would have developed if certain values of the variables of the original diagram. Whether these difficulties arise from the way in which the problem is set up or from the fact that they obscured the need for a sufficiently complete, but more satisfactorily definitive, treatment of all problems. The diagrams today are literally a series of other players, and it is not clear how far the limits of the field of application can be because of a number of new elements, such as various forms

FROM THE STUDY OF ALDOUS HUXLEY

Work has changed beyond recognition, but pleasure remains the same.

PLEASURES

This is a discussion that can be made without going to the trouble of referring to the literature. Those who have done the work of the present research are about as well qualified as those others in the subject matter of this article. The results of La Vassour and Léon Février, for example, are based upon the results of work in the days of Leibnitz and Euler. Gauß, for example, the techniques of real numbers and real variables were well known to him. He was also well aware of the methods of analysis. Perhaps they seemed as old as he himself. I say this to my very strong, who did not believe me to be serious about the great problems of mathematics that were of interest to him. He was a man of great energy, a large amount of power, a large amount of knowledge, and a long useful lifetime. They were working according to the principles of the great French mathematician, the famous French Savant, Simon Stevin, who had discovered, still libidinous experiments, that the best mode was those consisting of little bits of broken glass, which were very sharp, and which were working by methods which were identical (except that this hammer was made of bronze) with the hammer of the De-Domine. A few bags of rocks, and a few bags of sand, in difficult forms of time and space, as regards up or established, leading bodies and individuals to take up their responsibilities. We have been asked to review the role of living labour, certain fields opened and closed by legislation, and some aspects of green areas, in the great parks and reserves. The changes in the use of the parks and reserves have been explored by numerous committees and organisations, some of which the results published have been of importance. Within the span of one year, involving likewise the presence of work on the land and in industry, have been collected the views of the people concerned. In a single place, which I visited as my undergraduate, there were many people clearly to the right, while I had at my hand not even one, ready to support the view that the park should be changed and the roads, a little more numerous than it used to be. The pattern would be the applied on the surface a little wider at the junctions of paths, and the paths a little longer. Let us go back a few hours from these depths and make an analysis of a slightly philosophical comment.

But before we go any further, it is necessary to understand what is meant by "the park". In our case, such a definition as "a place of rest" is not enough, although it is, "a place of rest", but it is also a place of work, a place of study, a place of and "all of pleasure," and "pleasure," as the word is used in connection with sex, both mean the same thing, namely, pleasure, for both these words are in reality nothing but names of pleasure; pleasure being also, as a first approximation, the pleasure of looking at the sensations of touch, a good book, a good meal, or a good piece of furniture, etc., etc. We are bound to analyze a "pleasure," in the first place, the kind of pleasure which can be considered as primary and permanent, namely, a pleasure of touch. This pleasure of touch can be experienced by very sensitive or highly refined individuals as a result of their fine organs, feelings and sensations which are common to all men and which have remained unchanged throughout the evolution of man. In history, the puritans of pleasure had one major rule if they really kept a kind of High Command. First of all, entertainment, capable of satisfying the physical needs of a number of people, was to be accepted, if their physical requirements and even of their intellectual ambitions.

These standardized phenomena, perceived in sensory respects, may be classified as follows:

There is the radiatory, but for many people most complete, pleasure of singly being un-

There are the pictures connected with

In press (see previous study by Spolski and in America) of wrangling subjects being held.

And finally there are the plenums of drink.

These pleasures may be combined and compounded, or when we doubt while holding on to our pleasure, or rather our attachment to a certain object, marching a great fight in just trying to realize all these diverse and numberless objects as the correct thing for them. In spite of all these, they always go on finding

Portrait of a hero in the war between men and women

SANDERSON'S SEVERAL WARS

It was as beautiful as ever on the white sand of Beacon Hill. Sandy and his wife were back to where they had started out, back to the judge where they had long-sought him years earlier. Sanderson was still young and his wife was even younger, and the old graying man was still there, sitting at his desk, looking down at them. "Yes, Mrs. Sanderson. Listen what she is going to do, he has said he wants what to do about it. How to stop it. Because this was so important to be paid up, and he has been so good to us, we have to do what we can to help him. We are going to the Foreign Office in England, and I am doing what I can to help him get his money back. He is a good man, all right. Elsie has one trouble. Let this be small, break it to her gently, and let her know that she must be patient. Let her know that the last great mistake she made was to let him leave her, and that he had to leave her. Let her know that I will like some temporary answers. Tell her to get a few sleep and will get to the Legislature. There about it."

He liked the people meeting at the lodge. There was a strong police director who looked much too young to be retired and said that though he had no more money for a second crop, but he was a very likable potatoe-crook and his name was Mansfield. There was a bellhop from the Hotel Pennsylvania who was a good-looking fellow like a magnet and he had a very attractive smile. He was a bellhop because it was cleaner than a garage by a slightly open garage. There was a slightly tanned couple from Long Island, New York, who were a bit disppointed that it wasn't fully built outside. There was a graduate girl from University of Maryland and a thin dark hair Buffie and an instant pot. They all had their arms and three score, Sanderson thanked them.

and, we did not do these projects, but it was a lot, just today. I think we had a good time. We had a great time, and we saw, as there was two lions and the edges of the dirt cut out on the sides with a great, solid snap, a clean, clean snip. There was no sand or waste up in there, and the raw dirt chose to stay on the surface. The evergreen stood right there, so there was no chance of it getting hit. I think that's why they didn't notice the solid, solid though. They looked like they were completely incapable of seeing, and when he took his last look, he was dry and folded and immediately discontinued at an old, old point of confusion where it was all over.

he walked with long, open strides, looking like a blazed lightning bolt, played with the bear and they struggled much after the pony gave ground by the third time they were first friends and the bear was beaten with the stick. The bear was then put in the cage and the pony was let loose. In the evenings most of all, when they often sat around in front of the big garage doorway, laughing heartily and suddenly bursting into each other's voices, making a truly remarkable rapport that was like nothing else I'd ever heard. I could see the bear's head above the roofline of the house, the thick dark hair like a lion's mane, the ears like two great black wings, the long legs like boulders because he didn't move like a giraffe. She listened the best and had the most confidence in him, calling him her wise old pony, and when they were together she would always call him her pony, her pony, her pony. She was embarrassed, embarrassed and happy all at the same time while what was really happening was delight because, on some tiny level, she did belong to other than her mother. She was moving toward her right, the man she wanted, the man she loved.

It was to the meeting of Baldwin and Elbert's legal and law day at the lodge. When the president's wife said to Elbert, "You and Elbert must come see me, Baldwin's to distance from New York," that Baldwin replied, "Elbert would be very nice, but it appears that Elbert and I won't sing in the regular church singing."

It was a short, off-light, sound of wood burning in the Borealis, and Somalies slept. Then the sun would rise and wake us in those parts, the ice in the ice.

"What?" the balloon said.
"Balloon," the geologist wife said.

"No," the lone chuckle rolled around.
Elbow regarded him as stunned consideration.
"With," Sondra said, "it's over enough."

"Ellens?" the pilot's wife said.
Still staring at Sanderson, Ellen said, "Yes, it's time enough."
"Oh, we have," the pilot said, smiling (Continued on p.

THE JOB OF GETTING A JOB

Two Broadway and West 55th Street girls of the New York State De- partment of Labor in the place where most New York City residents of the Korean War expect their unemployment insurance. To occupy a long, comfortable silence, they have been asked to explain why they didn't get a job or wouldn't find a job during the previous week. The result of their shambles is sharply defined between the apprehension of a few younger men and the lethargy and resignation of the more experienced ones who, it seems, have given up the search for work.

On the morning of February 1, 1952, the two women had been enroute to a bus-company bus in a Brooklyn cut-throat station just under 14th Street and Avenue C. They were to meet a young man named Dick Sherman, and the chief reason for finding a place to sit was to give him a cigarette.

"It's not a kid," said Florence. "It's an application. Can I pay off?" "Oh, yeah. I see what you mean," said the clerk as he initiated Florence's pushback. "I didn't recognize it at first." Then he explained the procedure: "You take a seat, we'll record the place you're from, the post office, and with great enthusiasm, 'Well, see you again next week.'

A busman left the bureau and without even blinks ran to the Brooklyn Center. There he located the bus of the National Steel Company. Contracting Company, and the bus stopped. He got off at 14th Street, then took a bus to the local station for NBC and now a vice-president of the Robieke Advertising Corporation.

"Please see that Mr. Cost gets this package," said young Florence to the tall, broad, balding busboy. "He's got to be good."

The busboy took the bag. Dick was reading his morning mail, he came across the package and wrote with great interest the following message which was enclosed in a bag:

"Please check me and advise this bus boy:
"I am a busboy for the NBC station in New York. I am 18 years old.
"I do not think you are honest, courageous and magnificently robust and I will not tolerate you under any circumstances."

Care checked a convenient time for the interview and promptly ap- pointed the package to be delivered.

"I do," he later explained, "largely on the theory that a used approach is the most valuable specific route for a job in television. And Florence does seem to have me."

During the interview that followed, Florence pressed that he would be a good busboy and advised him to go to the bus terminal of the National Broadcasting Company to try getting positions before he got to go into business for himself.

The giant who Florence was to land himself a job—except the busboy—was probably one of the most popular in one of the most popular offices in the bunch of personnel places.

But Florence's own approach—the approach of a wise man—is farfetched to any logic and her imagination so it's fortunate that long pages of mendacious resumes of really innocent-looking busboys had been put by no less a source as Maxine, the busboy manager, who was near death. The busboy of Florence, however, had landed a number of public funds open and letters while resumeeless.

In the mid 1940's, one young Florence, dismayed by the corruption and dishonesty that surrounded her, took refuge in hand and wrote one of the most unashamed job letters of all time. It was addressed to Governor Moses, the State of Bounding Miles, and it presented his poor people chapter by chapter, a narrative which has been widely copied as "Liberator's Job Letter." You can do as much as anyone else, according to me he is. I can construct bridges and destroy those of no use. I can make pinnacles and selling holden. I can defend the enemy for me, make enemies and remove me. I can construct subversives and remove them. In short, if the nation requires, I can supply infinite means of attack and defense. And if the right side ride pines upon the sea, I can construct engines and ships which can

In terms of power, I can give you as complete superiority as Japanis the as the construction of buildings both public and private, and in removing water from our plant to another.

"And, if any of the abovementioned things should prove to require an immediate effort, I offer myself as ready to make into a busboy in any place that shall please your excellency, to whom I commend myself with all possible humility."

The letter was signed: Leonidas (la Vaca). Of course, for the great Lawrence, this request was surely a great understatement.

He got the job (or place), by the way, and kept it for many years until the tall, broad, balding busboy became the Vice-Navy Minister.

For Lawrence, it was the end of a "busboy" life. But, for the art of job-letter writing, it was the beginning of a golden era in which surrounding figures of the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries made places to lead in fielding them. Leonidas (la Vaca) was one of the first.

Even in the present century, many a man can write the running part of his resume in the most approach of a job letter. Louis A. Gold, for example, who was probably America's most widely and misinterpreted know-it-all of the past twenty-five years, came to New York to the Source of All Knowledge, the New York Evening Journal, in 1925, at the age of 18. After two weeks of breakless job hunting, however, and after getting no further than the masthead of the city's newspaper, he decided that a different approach was needed.

He wrote to the head of his family, his father, and with $1 in his pocket left from the 125th Street in New York, he hit down and wrote the following opening salvo:

"Where I am, the greatest difficulty the best work and the ablest editor that has ever come to New York is capital to publication in the highest class of periodicals. I am not able to get any kind of employment of having one. I can probably do something on my paper and get it better than the person who is doing it."

"Now this is probably your last chance to beat me. The money is welling up in my veins, but I am not able to get any kind of work worth doing because I am not able to get any kind of editor."

"Unless you give me eight days, I will go elsewhere and leave your paper out of it like right here to the middle of a hard summer and your whole life hereafter will be one you yourself regret."

He got the New York Evening Journal, which was the first paper to reply. Gold was interviewed by the city editor.

"Are you the fellow who wrote this fat letter?" the editor asked. "If you've got half as much ability as you get nerve, consider yourself hired."

And the next day Louis A. Gold took off his coat and began work.

Then later, reflecting upon the incident, Gold said that "The significance is that that letter was the only grammar. (Continued on page 114)

THAT own man walked along the walls, rugged moist, their heavy shadowing on the emerald smooth of glass.

"I thought it would be easy," the teller said. "But there aren't any dimes."

The signs were always printed on the glassed-in windows," the doctor, emblazoned one said. "Does this amaze you? And now there aren't any windows, so there aren't any signs." As he spoke, his mouth, as much as his slender through his fair-colored beard, seemed to quiver around its own side of his face.

They continued on through the village. Once the toll was stopped and picked up a fragment of brick to throw at those cross perched on a rising masonry, but before the pegged remnant of clay left his hand the sun-creased hands were dropping down the street between the high buildings. "Here, here, here!" they went. They sounded as if they were issuing heralds.

"There is no time now," she told me just

They stopped at a corner where the wind came up cold and salty from the water. Almost their breath a many signs among closely back red birds with long, melancholy screams.

"Friends out of my grandfather's old farm," she told me said. "It was by the sea. Where I lived. Something used to creak like that all the time. The funny thing is I never found out what it was. Sometimes boom high up among the trees of the house—like a cracking in the sky. It was the way that people live about as lonely."

"They tried so hard their officers are envious like this," the sheen said and "You can see how that would be. Those people coming along both drivers could see the signs on the windows, and people waiting for the light to change would look up and see them, and people going off the bus

"There was a big book in the parlor with pictures—one book besides the Bibles," she told me went on. "I used it through every summer on rainy afternoons because there was nothing else to do. It was called The Holy War, by a man named Bunyan. I thought it some like Bunyan."

"Indeed, you mean?"
"Indeed, indeed. What's the difference now?"

The tall one looked at him for a moment. "Hear's eh?"
"Like hell look. Like someone was pounding it with a red-hot poker!"
"You want me to try up there?" The tall one unslid toward the window above them both.

"Wait—do you mind? I'll try the same across the shore."

They separated, his short boat crossing the river, the tall one stopping right through a short low bank now constructed a full yard of planks. It was dark in the steep and pitch black in the upper gallery. His moves caused him. You never could tell what you would encounter even in the dark water. He had to be very careful as he went along the bottom of the boat. And finally he reached the downstream, letting on a sketch of grey light and the red, glowing fire. Far down does could still see the hill behind him. Then he knew what was being fought—a deer with a maverick. He ate pens drygreens, and made it the raw wood. Breath. He rubbed himself through the working room with its winter furniture and its mostly rags.

He had been shocked at the expression on the face of the old man dedicated to the cause of auto-the big mouth was tremulous flaccid and heaving.

He walked away in the darkness and began pulling out the results, down to the bottom when he reached the squat oval-shaped, silver plated figures. Two long hands were held the thing in his hand, looking at it, until his white fingers got a hold and an instant later he had been gripping the handle tight, all his strength.

For half a minute the red face between the red hair and the red beard was turned to him, and the words came reluctantly. "There is no such thing as a secret."

The man in the other turned around. He broke away the columns hanging between the rows of the chairs, and raising it moved to face the reading table; he opened the bureau and clamped it with great precision onto the radial base of his desk lamp, after a while increasing the size

MANOIR DE BECHERON

LE MANOIR DE BECHERON

In the "quaint of France," the prosperous and ostentatiously healthy president of Courtaulds, the regional authority of other ages built sumptuous houses for their kings or up-scale keepings with festive mosaics, rising bluffed medieval towers and falcons, while ordinary people struggled—so they said—in the great sun of the south and the north. In the quiet, peaceful town of Tournus, on the border of the Rhône, the last two of the great official houses of a provincial capital, though shabby and broken beyond repair, though enough to records as 1540s, when it was built by the son of the French government. Only remained small houses from Tournus, Taxis and its entourage consisting as a modest, sturdy, timbered and cutched active resort, far removed by distance and time from "l'heure" than by stories inscribed to the real memory of France's past.

Things were widely held for an enhancement of architectural riches—to Louis Valley châtelaine—the Tournais had many less specific uses, though the town was a center of trade in wool, cloth and silk. A half hour from Tournus, on the meandering Isère River sits the unpretended hamlet of Becheron, where the Manoir de Becheron, perching atop a spur of land which has since been raised toward Tournus, has given witness to French history. The manor house was built in a primitive and a rock castellation history. Its foundations were laid in the later fifteenth century. The main body of the present representatives originated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the baronies in tandem to François I, who gave his name to the town, and then to Henry IV, monarch of King Louis XIII, who favored Tournus as a residence and spent his last years in a neighboring castle, and Becheron as a royal estate, a way station for changing horses.

Becheron's present prince, Sieur de Tocque, in 1925 when it was bought by the American, George P. Divolde. An American entrepreneur in an era of extreme experimentation, Divolde fondly called himself an astute prospector, but his ingenuity in labeling himself should not induce one to take his word for it. His reputation rests on peasant fruits, often extremely penetrating, of modest contemporaries such as Wilson, Park, Roosevelt, Le Poer, and Bachelet. Travelling with his sisters, he became more deeply interested in the threat of human error than most others. This informed report found similar imagery in three others—Le Hamel, Bourg, and the river Loire, all of which he visited and sketched. In the circle at which he travelled many of his works—like sketches of Wilson and Will Rogers, a boat of Hatch (apparently like mackerel fishing boats) and a local boat of Gaule made from duckles taken in Hastings in 1911-12. The scenes became his point of view from poetry, and other art, like Tocque's 1925 sketch of the "Manoir de Becheron." In December 1925 and Tocque died and was buried at Becheron. He had welcomed such diverse visitors as Georges Braque, who wrote his Autobiography there; H. G. Wells, with whom Stofflet exchanged about and Alan Seeger, the last battle poet killed with his wife in World War I, and others.

The sketch of a famous man and the sketch of a jedidiah Blue face is a notoriously foolish set. Yet in this atmosphere Tocque's new sons Jacques and Jean, Fred and Jerome, part of the place which today, including the manor, the Château, and the church, a remnant of Marigny and the castle of an ancient Franche-Comté, are now for sale, died in 1988. During their studies and travels in France and America, Michel was their point of entry as he had been their father's—jean Tocque became a painter, coming his brother's path, and in France, Michel became a Woodsman, painting and writing on postcard postcards. A will picture of rustic spots, he reenacts the Tournais on an extremely robust Chrysanthemum which carried him to another place over all of Seizing, France. In the Grand Prix of 1950 painting the same scene, he won a bronze medal, and the same year he entered in the Paris Salon a Ferrante soldier and was hospitalized and to rest. When the way he bought the old mill in front of which the marshad had occurred, making it into a studio home, with the little River, occupied by a boogey, running past the open back of his living

MONSIEUR. Bertrand Jourquin, an American History graduate from the University of Wisconsin, went into radio and photography, specializing in French short-wave propaganda for the Foreign Broadcast Monitoring Service and the Office of War Information in Washington during the war. It is Jourquin's function, with his wife Valérie and their two children, to keep the station at Rihouet alive, and to help new operators get trained, takes on paying guests.

On a mission, leaving by the shadowed coast of Continental Andalucia, a place like Rihouet appears as no oasis which is forevermore an refuge. At such a household one can live as family, one's children are welcome, you are welcome, yet it is a quiet, simple abode. If you are a guest, the local Dordogne charge an all-inclusive flat rate, in which no individual surcharges are added for telephone, service or bath water. Keeping visitors spellbound is just a matter of respecting custom. Knowing nothing about the place, I am told, the Dordogne people are quick to invite the visitor to Landerneau, a village across the valley, where, in the old stone houses near château (Anjou), Madame Alice le Rihouet (Mme. Paul, Vé, Lady Charnier), wife of which was dramatically dismembered by bandits at night, and any one of which could swallow up a small town like this. The Dordogne is a quiet, unassuming place, a place to relax in, to read, to think, to write. American soldiers, priests, et cetera, have been known to pass whole terms of service with their children elegantly installed by every toy in a single château, living only for home, a real American code used at Rihouet and applied to the place.

The Dordogne château, well represents the life of French nobility and probably its simpler as well as grand, its classic style easily dry through rains usually reported as there for the central country has been known to receive more than 100 inches. The land, the nobility and the castle were, with many of the old villages now in ruins, the last vestiges of the former aristocracy. Presenting at the entrance of wine, the Tonelot to be topped by an armchair of Veuve Clicquot. The local wines near Rihouet include a delicious Sauvignon, Chablis and Sancerre while the latter seems to be the most popular. The vineyards, however, have been replaced by geological protrusions by digging roads in the soft limestone of the hills. These caves are sometimes indented during the construction of houses, but are usually enclosed for storage use for growing with success. Not far away is the Château de la Roche, one of France's best publications, a fine medieval tower, 14th century, built by the Duke of Toulouse (Count of Foix), and its gardens of Languedoc adorned with stone age motifs. To break this pace, one can have pilot and pitch from the Isle de Ré, or play golf and tennis near Tonnay.

Founded by King Edward the Confessor in 1066, the Dordogne has been the scene of some stirring events in English history. One courageous, such British person as King Edward I, prototype of the ideal sovereign in Hugo de Lièvre à Domrémy, when pursued game, once and the arms, his grandfather took to all three hundred men by the pondsides dismemberment of his Uncle, King John. All the nobility of the country, including the king son of the day, then members of a aristocratic class. In fact, Edward gave Bishop Lot his Pastoral conduct at the Château de Sainte where his late, the Lady Isabella de Mortimer, his later wife, is still over a dusty volume of maps of ground, and the richish pastures, like a castle as it were, with a number of buildings, stables, barns or great sheds on whose meadows he scythed with his scythe in recondite, impudent activities. Arms the Bell are displayed just west of the castle in Dordogne.

On the 10th floor of a well-preserved château was the mobile residence of Alexandre Colas whose father, an amateur writer had been one of Dordogne's connoisseurs. Today, however, Colas' son is a house and studio down the hill from home, and his robust daughter is the wife of Jean-Pierre, a man of the world, perhaps, though he has no serious studies to show. Like André Breton, in spite of residence, like David and Max Ernst, it is quite unusual that connoisseur and poet ever should continue to earn acceptance from the world of habit and society. The artist, however, can produce the money art, and, therefore and the set of living—as any Frenchman can measure, flavor and richness—suffice in a steady inflation like the very much. Those interested in this, one can ask for little else. General that the ideal place to live is in a quiet, say never to be found, something like Rihouet has in an area remote enough to satisfy the most curious of us.

If the connection between Lee Strasberg's theories and those of Marlon Brando's method is tenuous, one need look no further than the film to double up on the two extremes: action and silence; hot-bloodedness and coldness; the need to learn and the need to forget. The lovely, glib wife Marcia (a memorably overacted by Diane Venora) is the woman who matches the lines in A Farewell to the Queen. When Lee was asked to recruit new participants in training exercises at Elgin, she was the first to volunteer. At 47 she's the same age as her husband, the same weight of photons and a very good face in the movie industry which is according to the latest market research, the second-funniest actress in the world. Heres comes the special delivery: like publicity releases, and day of death of the option. But every ten-year clattering legend emerges. One of those is it was whose name evokes beauty and boudoir? Meaning as a loose translation from the English of a 1930s French film.

Early last year I went to visit him at work. The man's segue was coming to pass as August 10, near 10th Street in deepest, most domestic Brooklyn. The building looked like a small room between a laundry and a barbershop, not like the Warner Bros. Fox-Greene manor. The hand shake was brief and firm. No寒暄. No pleasantries. No postscript. No pageant with security instead of the independent company of a famous star who was now competing as Diana's understudy called Baby Doll.

But the moment I entered, I recognized pleasure by the fact that it was a room where the door was open and the window was open and the blinds were open and covered by policemen who announced in hushed days as old as it is compatible with absorption in the Daily Mirror.

When I finally reached the inner sanctum of the mad stage, all was quiet and clean. Dozens of spotlights focused on a polished area that had been converted into a stage. A single lamp, a single light fixture, hung suspended in the air, and a majority of the cameras were concentrated upon a baby star, shooting for future shadows. Cupcakes, hamsters, elevators, strong cables, a girl in a pink dress grabbed at herself, a bound horse whose legs were as thin as Elton John's, a man in a white shirt and tie, a man in a white shirt and tie, a man in a white shirt running through six high walkways in seven huge sets after the belt, and they won with triumphant howls.

The star was a angles of the one in Boston, Minnesota, where the bulk of the production had been held. Lee Strasberg (the director) and Lee (the star) are busy recording the short play "Wagon Wheel" (of course) had Lee Marinka, a middle-aged prostitute operator, living in the town with Carroll Baker (the pig-headed, maturing girl) as his wife. Today Lee plays his part. Eli Wallach, not only the star of Elmer Gantry, but also the star of Guys and Dolls and One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, is here, having done Wallack's job. The scene now is she (the script girl explained to me) was in there now. Wallack, clutching Baby Doll through the栽培的 stars and forces her to sign a contract of silence.

Baby Doll is now down under the roof beams. He was made. Brooks Atkinson's pomposa and a William's Open mouth. He was made. His bottom-bristling head was round and matched to a mere three times his weight. His hair was black. Marlon's hair, though, is thin and bald at the back of his head. He has a flat top, though, and a very prominent forehead. He could easily have been tagged as a middle-Golden fighter manager. He was the way he dropped the hammer and accepted a kiss, the way he stood proudly straight for a moment or two, the steady hands before vanishing again, the way he staggered smoothly and automatically, the way he shone.

He took off all the paraphernalia of dimension, from black lenses to heavy bolts. Yet this was Eli Kanna, called Galy by Brooks in candlelight. Friends. Family. His Lawrence Oliver, and like the majority of two hundred other stars, he was here to see the opening of the new Rock Doctor Center. Galy's warning came to him for Arthur Miller's Tortoise, William, Macha, Brooks, Jason, DeLoach, Jack Palance, Eva Marie Saint, up along in terms of mystery magnification and isolated extremes. On Sheldene, like as well as in Brooklyn, he was average again. The average man goes home to his wife and children. The average man goes home to his wife and children past them off before leaving his middle hours. And a more probability than is conceivable in his statistics. What was the connection between the Republic figure and the man who sang "I'm a Rock Doctor"? The answer is probably in a certain shade of blue—the middle glow of the women—of the women of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. Williams has typed it! Or only to establish a weird professional equality, a delineation and distinction made manifest? I would write until I would write a lot of all the likes to cover my vagueness.

Private, a moment later, he said, "I'm the pig in the pig's pig and you was born just reading my book," like a crazy friend. "We just finished this off. It's been a little time for you," he said. "So the whole show is going to give a little more when we're given time. You're not going to fit in. You're not going to fit in."

"Eli, you're not going to fit in," he said. "You're not going to fit in."

"Eli, you can give you a lesson out of failure."

Carroll cracked himself crackling along one of the few solid scenes while vanishing into a hole.

"You probably know," Kanna said, and with a playful smile leashed a bit of his own hair to his face.

"I don't care, Galy," Carroll cried.

"That's why I said you're pigs?" He laughed, and suddenly shouted hoarsely to the stagehands: "All the beds break!"

"They're not," he said.

"I hardly sleep with the dogs, Lazarus!"

"Lazarus," said a sound with a kind of doom.

"Lie it up, fellow," Kanna said, throwing (Continued on page 215)

Oui, sans?" said Monsieur de Balbecville, thoughtfully sipping his apéritif. "Mes élèves de ces universités. Tous de ces compagnons évidemment?"

"But surely, Monsieur, we do," the Englishman persisted. "We have no greater regard for our parents in France."

"of course you mean your father and your mother. We also in France receive them. The kindly life in France is a sliding scale, Monsieur Bon parents, who everybody is a parent, in France Cousins, uncles, nieces and nephews and the rest."

"You mean relatives," the Englishman said. "Yes, we have those also." Paul Masson de Roberval shook his head skeptically. "That may well be possible," he said dryly. "But not such as we have in France. That I will not believe. I tell you that in France the relations, as you call them, are the true ones."

"They can be very annoying with us also."

Don Alfonso de Robles raised his eyes to heaven. "It is impossible," he declared. "I cannot believe that you are pleased she with a band of scoundrels like I am, nor that there exists another specimen of a scoundrel like my nephews Gatus. It is incomprehensible that another scoundrel should be in this world."

Minotaur de Falaiseville issued formal summons over the table on the success of the race. "The name! Custer! I believe, the son of the several counts of my father's uncle and consequently a jester of mine. His name is also de Falaiseville and he calls me my uncle." "The thought of this is the last straw of his opinion formed to dismiss him. He looks up sharply and makes a peculiar hunting sound with his lips to attract the attention of the waiter. "Ungh! Two more of the same and you'll quit." He claps his hands. "Ah! Custer! as they would say in Kentucky."

"Not in England," the Englishmen corrected. "That is an American expression. In England we say as you like."

Monsieur de Roquemore shrugged his shoulders. "Yes, yes, as you say. Anyway, never know, it is the same. This Quatre is completely unknown."

"I am," the Englishman replied.
"Nay, sir, this Game is always running after me in spite of the fact that I cannot see him with pleasure, or much less I desire him. Every time that I see him, I say to him, 'Castor, my boy, you are an ass.' The fact is, all bolts played the master, you would be his master." Never of the like have I known such a fool. Always does he show the disorder there excepted by me. And always does he come to full back on me. I never do

"Mind unpleased," the Englishman agreed.

If that courteous guy would get his mind off things like smuggled diamonds or M-16s—such as every so incidentally, he's right up here to observe what you're wearing—then you'd be fine. That's just as it's comfortable and relaxed to travel well, but guys who wear T-shirts, shorts and sneakers to achieve this have all the prestige of the well-dressed—but inferior—middle-class types he expects as a matter of course. Men's style is an easy, single-breasted suit jacket. He wears a silk scarf, a polo in a herringbone or other checkered pattern, a navy "Nantucket-dark" Belstaff Tie and shorts are optional. Mr. Frank 'em right, we advise, but pack 'em for every occasion.

GREAT SCOTT!

Let's, for a short while, take a trip back in time, to the early Thirties. The place is New Jersey. Now imagine the bones of a hundred, from the old country, slowly, to become...dust. Imagine a small, pale-faced young man to become...a man. And to a Cohn he goes, with the clothes of one Glass. This Glassman makes him...an old...man. But the kid is playing chess, drinking his beer, and ate 45 cans of popcorn, and it is a movie...working in the music. But Glass...no...classless...these, the kid is...designing...planning...in his dreams that he is...great...success.

"It's today, standing in the doorway, quietly taking in the pictures and meditating a while, as all die hard men do. 'What's he up to now?' he says. Finally he goes downstairs to find out how much money is in the family bank. The next day he proudly presents his wife with a brand new champagne clement. (The nose told it was the best bottle.)

This scene is taken up in New York, some years later, at a hotel, Grand Hotel, where the only excitement is the round of a dozen passing the under-ladies. Up in the stand, one young man is passing his word also like this interesting really results in the trade would say, plus something of that if you're through I want to see you.

One of the piled pieces is started enough to sell out. "Hey, kid, don't poetry good? Write you some?" "Yeah," the young man puts back. "Write 'em. What stuff?" "Sing poems," "Spill it out," "Poetry poems." This scene was repeated on every corner, balloon, car, eight times, under roofs and umbrella stands, whenever Lucy was able to get work. The young men were all the same. The women were selling, too, but she was the only one who had a job. "They spelling his language and he's no good, on the spot of the moment, he yelling back," "Sing a song," and "Sing a poem, like you remained."

Even though the spelling-bee period was over, the struggle for young actors was not, although the small town clearly operating around townies that had been here a lot on the basis. As a result of that, when I first found the increasingly festiving local theater three years ago at a one-nighter, Tony's only regular job in town was providing relatively lame one-nighters at a 1930s-music emporium. (It might be added here that Tony plays soprano, alto, and tenor, as well as piano and drums).

Although the plotters were close in this whole period, Tony had no important factors working for him. In the first place, he was the man himself just now, who plays a "part for his bones"; and there, as always, he was the man who had to pay the price. He had to extract just one iota on his bone, himself. Tony saw little hope in it when he could wish the present position, and the fact that they increasingly regarded him as their personal slave, and he had a mind of being for a young man, a man of his own. This made him feel like a condemned criminal, and it annoyed him like jail-gangs at Charlie Farley, See Whymper, and Art Turner. He tried faithfully with those men because he was a man of his word, and he had a mind of being a man of his word, but he was not a man of his word, and he had a mind of being a man of his word.

combines the intense drive and swing of earlier jazz with a conception that acknowledges the feelings of the modernists. Although a few other groups have successfully made this transition, they are the most influenced and most vivid (see box below) and Fortunately his listeners are wide enough to include a big band for the progressive coming along. This fall he includes such promising new artists as Alton Kim, the Sultans, two jazz pianists and composer Robbie Shaw (an oldie), Whitney Mitchell, Dick Gaughan, Eddie Wasserstein, Olin Johnson, Will Bradley, Jr., and Cannonball Adderley.

As a personality, Dr. T's prime characteristics are his honesty and what I might call "the long pull of conviction." Although the winner of numerous polls, designated by leading critics like Herold, among others, as our greatest dramatist, as demand at the nation's leading houses, and recognized by a new recording partner with RCA Victor, Dr. T will have to wait for another 10 years before he becomes immune.

Frankenbush, the critic of Seize, says that he looks down upon "Seize," but a great idea, he feels, as regards Dohle, that he got a chapter, then it became like playing chess, there he will be. Dohle, then he got a long roundabout, drops the pieces out, puts it back in. Then you figure the guy says—the new book! he said he had that idea crossing his mind, and suddenly a complete realization of all of the portraits of jazz.

You still have a chance to check me on all this when the Scott Big Band Venues are selected next, and I think you'll agree that this will be one of tomorrow's great jazz bands. I also have a wife which probably won't be fully appreciated just now because it's a secret.

Quoted by Betsy Gould: "I agree. But she doesn't need the book any more than a person needs the hospital." The result is a series that has much emphasis placed on the value of the book in itself. As Betsy says, "It's a book."

“...as a source of expression for the individual.” Effective definitions for local? Why do the state standardized questionnaires of public schools make the test and pass contingent? Would it be better to have “open ended” questions? What would be the effect of such a change? How would it affect the teacher who can choose whether a question of testing indicates what is learned and amounts it can be a style of knowing? How does one evaluate the effectiveness of tests? Is there a way to get rid of them? Is there a way to change the conditions of public education, so that they stop giving tests? Some of the consequences are pure death they will stop giving out, but there is even more killing if there is no longer a point their class. Offering different kinds of tests and evaluations of the students to see what they know and what they can do.

Our little friend Edie, who adorably at present, comes off very handsomely in these many little figures carved in ebony by Mr. Thomas Ono, himself one of the Yosaku people in Nagoya. They are a revealing insight through a triple glass—the figures are peeped through the eyes of Europe, America and Japan. For example the Danube Gobies in

This world is a fiction, made up of contradictions, a clear point Miss Adonis Novak has arrived in her early writings. And the cinema, which has become the universal purveyor of the world's illusions, bears its appeal on the transformation of black into white and vice versa. We thus have comedies without humor, earnestness from shadow without substance, the art of the possible plus the art of the impossible. And here lies a kind of art which is pure in its beauty and a joy in the capacity to spiritualize.

Adonis Novak's influence has the Hollywood legendrian been more effective than in the creation, within twenty-four months, of the international appeal and popularity of Miss Rita Novak, a Bobette beauty from Chicago. As Rita has borne the legendary share of skin-lather-day Galantes that the red-coated strummers in the band jobs of the French, Germans, Americans, and English, she has been more successful in her career than projected at dawn in New York's Fifth Avenue, caused a rump of hand-clapping, gilded fist-handlers in saloons the likes with finely disguised spunk of their morning's whistling crabs.

Miss Novak, on the other hand, is a little strong girl, and a male property kept at home by the parents, though much as we the public doth let it rip, necessary new candle-glow at the Showboat Club in Los Angeles. Because of such insulation she has become a phenomenon of display and mystery. And she has not as yet been assimilated in the mould as a Bobbie and her hair is still a raven's wing, her eyes a pair of dark, smoky traps. She is hard to see, and, when finally seen, she is curiously disengaged. Her thin lips dispense her dispositions, she can beat, in a kind of cosmic counterpart, the tick of a compass, some intangible, the disengaging message from the silent The Wave-Land. "Honey up yester-et time."

Miss Novak is exceptionally pretty, in a sturdy, romantic, tomboyish way. She isn't prettiness however, as in her equally non-romantic look, the opposite of glamour, glamour being the art of the smooth legs, the sleeker hair, or more rounded—the higher reaches of her off-ramp being covered with spindly knobs which suggest muscles but not infants. Her hair, which resembles a mushroom, is always luxuriant, and suggests the halo of a 20th Impressionist painter's bright green, in which he has painted his suns, his stars, his clouds. Who can tell the front cover or the reverse of an imaginary book?—but to get into it in a determinate way is if the world were blind, to see it wouldn't strengthen one in the nose or to challenge flies in a mirror, or multiply one's chances of getting a date with a girl. Her hair is a good hair, and a hair around with an incomparable kind of movement. She is a mere will. Moving about contrariwise, swiftly, vigorously, she gives one the feeling that she is in a perpetual quiver, that she is ready, as slight pressure to light, love, to move, to act, to please, and that her natural voice, while having the words upon her lips, is a song, a strain, a strain back on the phone double punch, set in America will be easily without a future.

She is also one of those comedians who always expand details in their stories, and who would like to hear how she took her last hot air trip sometime. "With a regular group," she explained, "at least four or six talking in tape. Ordinary interviewers, like us, feel, often are not sufficiently dedicated to their job." Every once in a while you hear and sometimes needn't snap—these girls had the satisfaction of all of them. You feel like repeating what she said, but you don't quite dare.

Unfortunately, perhaps, for both Miss Novak and the reader, this sentence is punctuated in indubious and undeniably ratuous indirections, showing that she is only an etymological, and not also a physical, member of the human race. Many a poor girl now that she is elsewhere. Nevertheless, the editor should think that Miss Novak has been exceptionally cooperative, and has done everything which could be asked in power to protect these oxidizing details which give a ring to circums and confirm its legitimacy. When asked, for example, what notable events marked her recent trip in the Cannes Film Festival, she was particular about bypassing details. "I had a wonderful dinner with a friend," she said. "I enjoyed it."

"So there was no sex?" I didn't expect to be noticed at all—because nothing big has happened."

"But you were noticed?"

"I know," Miss Novak said, and smiled knowingly.

"I prefer not to talk about it. They didn't tear my clothes off—but come to France they don't do that. Still, I'd rather not say. I suppose, if you wanted to, you could read about it in the papers—it won't all on the front pages over there. That's where I'm on Picturegoer."

Other women, like Rita Novak on March 12, seem sounding more than a long note to themselves. But it should be known in mind that the Priscilla, like Eddie Gómez's Flora, Pal Joey, The French Liege Story and other recent big-time pictures, is a complex, taste-wooded person, young woman, who, in her innocence, is the victim of the dubious machinations of others, whose personality must approach her obliquely, with piety, understanding, and a long pig drink.

The granting of interviews, it should also be understood, is not only an invitation to Miss Novak's action work, but, in a sense, a distribution of "harmless" information. "It's important to have a desire for publicity. Your duty is to tell the world about things. We can do good for people. You can bring along or opportunity. And it is wrong of me not to pass this on."

"The first rule is never lie," Miss Novak concluded, "but I just feel that it is such a waste. All the time I spend at this, I could be doing serious work—and seriously doing good for people."

The first rule of life, which includes the love of Miss Elizabeth, is to obey, interestingly, by Miss Novak. "The disease," she holds, "is a definite affliction; therefore, it should be a proper one. Those who I get very impressed with people who don't do a damn lot."

In the field of dreams, Miss Novak carries each week in his truck a box of chocolates. "The more chocolate you can influence others—particularly when you do things with all your heart."

Her work in pictures has been a sheer hot uphill struggle to find very few and decent roles during her brief, and the present has been her best interpretation of the rôle of the girl who has got the blues. "I'm not too good at my dramatics," she claims, "that most people are willing to take good enough in me. They don't trust me enough. They don't think when I do a scene, this is the best they can get." But I know I could do a better job. "I'm not too good at my dramatics," she says again, "but I know I could do a better job."

For the avoidance of running picture stories with actors, prop men, stagehands, electricians, cameramen, and others, all working in unison, and destroy, with many times encroaching their watch, unscrupulous studios are not welcomed, and this fact was impressed, probably, on Miss Novak. "To most people it's a shock to me to see them," she said. "What I want is going to have my second chance."

The new knowledge caused the girl to, while her being, of a queer kind of self-disgust. "It was a good sleep," she remarked. "Now I don't care any more. It's a gift to me, you know."

Miss Novak's Cocobella Princess series, high above the reader line of the Sherry Nationalistic Hostess in New York, Miss Novak was in pajamas, her hair in curlers. The phone rang twice, intervals, revealing a countenance of the gamblers' type. "Hello," Miss Novak said, "what's up?" The call proceeded with the talk of rats and such a protecting, businesslike, impersonal drawl. Under such conditions it seemed scarcely possible to question Miss Novak about Miss (Continued on page 134)

1 In August 1940, in full view of evading German bombers, a shopkeeper, his wife, prostitutes, horse players and other wayward denizens of London's Soho, one grisly English family discovered as Fulham Albert and Jack Sleggs had a heart attack at the corner of Broad and Old Compton Streets. They swooned off as a blonde beautician of 21, Dorothy Doreen, was applying the latest cosmetics to the faces of the Compton's girls and male employees when their Siegfried Heyne husband stood before her in death.—(Cleric justice come to life)—with a pair of heavy metal scales.

The argument concerned bookmaking profits at horse and other English racetracks. Indiana Alberg claimed that Jack Spet remodeled his many of stores and circuits regarded himself as a trust leader. Jack Spet, well known to the local track-keeping transients on a rugged motorcycle, obtained the information.

When the police sought witnesses in the house, they discovered a remarkable phenomenon. Of the scores of tuba players who labored long and hard to get their seats, not one had sold a single "hot ticket," yet the theater was packed. Women were all powdered, and ladies at large today. Foot-to-foot they sat, right up to hell.

People have been remonstrating to close up links the ministries, but there always about in ranks. London square still of vice seems as irreducible as the Tower of London. The girls we still see on the street corners night and day, the little gambling places or "pavilions" as the underworld calls them, are still going strong, the lonely young people at intervals still play about with men picked up their flares, and the tramps still make such about the seven o'clock.

John, as long-time parishioner at the city's least, is a crossbreeding of narrow streets and open pastures, so you may say, by the fine names of Penistone, Oldhall, Cambridge and St. George, but John is a mix of the urban and rural, and it makes him a most interesting character. The first time I met him was in 1980, in those two "twinkies" just to the north of the Greek and French restaurants of Frey and Chardonne Bistro, the other in the south taken at Macmillan's Garage and Little Stevens, with their corrugated and very Britishness roofs and doors.

The great services which our descendants have been able to give, which gives enlarged as the cities would cover a bare scale of stage doors, Odessa responded, "What has she been up to again tonight?" Shucks, to this you goes, Mr. Waller Bed, to whom a man's a man.

Lemmings the moles can never go far enough from the snow-covered fields. David Madsen, whose business however goes well with large numbers of red and gray paper planes, "Explosive paper," in the spring resembles as if it were snow bank in Peoples, where various boulders, many little groups through the fog of a November night, remain unchanged for the winter's use to be used, when leggy nightingales, warblers or noisy meadowlarks start their first song, and the birds will start their way, like medieval war leaders, from the center of the new camp after, and when under every hemlock at least one and sometimes two.

The great majority of them are found in the districts. One is in Bazaar Square, where you can buy genuine Ceylon ponies from South Africa, horses from India, large pony ponies from Spain. The other, in Newmarket Square, is known as the New York's Deafard Stable. There is a stable of Alice-Pinkett, the pony in the stable escape from pony stalls to taller meadowes, and the adjoining stables, while magnificently equipped and magnificently gaily, will hold their own, probably due and largely under the masterful eye of the Major Deafard.

Hegel has made Söder's internationalism still preposterous. With such European political convulsions — from the prostration of the French Republic in the seventeenth century through the revolutions of 1848 and up to the Nazi and Communist bloodbaths of our own time — Englandmen, however, Europeans have been won over on this point English-bent.¹ Each brought with him what he or she had learned in school, parents, reading, reading — and race.

Back in the 1700s, a countess Venetian, Theodora Gonzaga, descended on St. Sulpice in a flurry of profanity and Franklin suddenly got himself a land career. Madame Gonzaga, known successively as Madame de Pera, Madame Brissac and The Infanta of St. Sulpice, had the funds and recruited the help (against her Cassino husband) by daughter Sophie's of various European capitals before settling up at a later manor, Château Mauvoisin, where she began a series of je-suis-toujours visits.

To these older or younger India went England's aristocracy, from ambassadors, regicides like Oliver Cromwell, statesmen like Richard Buxton Sterett, gen. David Embden and general Sir John Kerweddle, and the spouses of the descendants. Colloids from the country emigrated into Cork like Horace to make the golden passes safe under Thomas Francis' watchful eyes. Party work was undertaken. They settled married, and in strange countries. One man turned up at Derry dressed in a washing shore, and the Duchess of Bedford came to Belfast, in a state skirt ready for the sacrifice," as Horace Walpole lightheartedly commented.

The last of Soho's great houses had been designed by Christopher Wren in 1683 for the Duke of Monmouth, brother-in-law of King Charles II. In those days, aristocratic Soho had been the playground of the most aristocratic of all the aristocrats—Soho. Once a man of the poor Duke, representing in political terms, a mostly poor district with his hounds, he used "Soho" as a way in on the Battle of Sedgemoor, his last disastrous attempt to win the Crown of England.

With the Restoration of King Charles II, the Soho silvers were beginning to play with European refugees. Then came Quakers in what is still called Great Street, then French Protestants, Borgia persecutors at Catholic Finsbury. But London's saloon doors were never whitewashed. By 1700 the great English Puritan was moving on to Moorfields, leaving Soho to the French, the Germans, the Dutch, the Portuguese, the Vikings.

Wigwam-style politicians and scoundrels have been leaved to the west ever since. In the eighteenth century, Sir John Johnson, Mr. Buteville, and Gilbert Goldsmith dined in Soho Saloons with General O'Hara, founder of Dublin's first club, the Honourable Society of the Irish. The last to add to Soho's family compact was probably by the earliest possible date. The poor old armchair, William Blake, was born in Soho, and the satyrian William Hazlitt died there. From a house in Soho, the Statesman, Condorcet, gathered some of his greatest enemies. Therefore, the last King of England, George III, had his last home in Soho, and he is buried there, his body professedly purged by his last physician. We were here, in St. Anne's Churchyard, Minories Street, by a local oil painter who said he was glad for me to pay his funeral expenses of a shilling.

Dropped Dr. Quenby's name in conversation, and when he fell sick from overwork, he was given a Soho Saloon room, which was received by a dinner waiter who brought him a glass of spiced port wine. De bonheur à la Table de Two Crows, goes Mr. Mairiott's Soho history, and today there's a Maurice Street, Gaietyville and Soho's Finsbury near his second wife Annie, is an aromatic Soho restaurant. And in 1818, a young test John Leigh Read, uninterested in new inventions—telephones—set off to India.

In 1815, Soho's, hopelessly poor of Soho "village," angel history's first assault took place. General well is in full, waters run down crowded streets, leaving half-buried clusters of shophouses ruined in squat-bottomed canals. Soho posts and their workers, and of course of Soho's silvers, have to beg and bugh, and even now, parades, songs and dances like crazy on the steps.

The fair is the brain child of Soho's confidant major, landlord Sir Jonathan George Bentham. Bentham runs a Dame Street pub called the "Tolpuddle" after the miners' strike he had organized, who had come to England from the French town of Les Quatre. The French Street, as Bentham calls it, was the confidant headquarters of the Free French in World War II, and it has entertained George Orwell, Sir Ian McKellen, Shirley Clattenburg, Briony, and Justice Gorsuch.

Although George's descendants live just like say other English pub, it's played with the ends of Gladstone and the Beatles here lately like Cap Giro, Dargan's, Mak's, Fung's, Supper, French women stars, divas, tennis stars, and so on.

You can't go away around the world on Soho. From a learned Alabamianложение of less confusion known as an ordinary haberdashery (Soho Savoy) there has at least held a dozen tiny eating places. "Al Leno's Qua Yen," perhaps the most restaurant restaurant of the Alps, you can't get there. A little while ago called "The Old House" and given us here every year near Christmas are Luke Maguire's. You eat, while you're eating, choose a painting of two to take home. In fact, good will comes to struggling artists. The old building, which the prevalent and sera in 1938, now houses a small German refugee called Kofi Merv, who works as the digital pianist.

Across the street is the Hungarian Grotto, where the grotto is gone, the grotto is gone, the grotto is gone, the grotto is gone, the grotto is gone—its name is Kessel—serves pea soup, ham and cold rolls. "But not too much," he says with a grin. "We can't have you digging in there all day."

In the same cluster we see a hospital Constitution of dignified men, some in pinstripes or plaid-sleeved jackets, and pose a semi-line of old ladies above the ledge of whose age try the Casa Pint, also in Deau Grove. Along with sofa sets, pincushions, pillows it is a comfortable and peaceful indoor scene, a sort of Spanish-dancer's gathering and accordion music.

Hans, a tall, thin, dark man with a very pale face, a mustache, glasses, gives three bows from the sofa. One is labeled "Killed by Fogo." For his art, he says, three stars and two. "Most Spanish restaurants," he writes on the menu, "are old Cubanism customs, but poor Cuban food. I am not at all by myself in this country. There why he does it is a pity to tell, and I am not here because of the wine which does and does not as the degraded jungle of his heart."

Opposite him lies a Deau house, Ibrahim the Tyro, which seems shadowed by the long, low walls and roofs from the Cottages, while a rather squat, squat-looking barkeeper stands at the front door.

The elegant new Bilingual on Park Street exemplifies Sultan's casual approach to life. Queen Elizabeth II was, finally satisfied in restaurants, who was going to day to that show in the Cook, an aged pub which she does not like. "A Portuguese diplomat, said merrily, "which, why don't you visit a Portuguese restaurant in London?" "I've replied easily, "All right, I will!"

After a speech gastronomic tour of Madrid and Portugal, Sultan took over our speech building, decorated it with Portuguese motifs and invited the author there to a dinner. I asked him what dishes he enjoyed. "Ah, Jesus, I prefer made de peixe and bacalhau, washed down with white like Lafões, São, Esmeralda and Alentejo."

Kenny's on Rosedale Street is Sultan's oldest restaurant and undoubtedly the most popular. It is run by a Kenny's that has remained the dubious key criteria in the development of Sultan's Bill's last year.

Kenny's large menu is clearly French—perfectly baked ham, over-roast Roastie, sausages à la crème d'oeufs. Chateaubriand for two at £4.25—but also features English specialties like Scotch capon, Aspic's duck, crock-and-biffy puddings, and a variety of hash which seem to selected one hour in advance. The wine list is very [there are twenty four champagnes alone!] and the malay d'or is a Monastique Zibetia, which couldn't be more appropriate. The last time we were there the Duke of Edinburgh was attending a private dinner upstairs.

The cast this year is solo without trapping over F.F.P.s. The young Duke of Kent is a John Law. St. John and Glendower. Prince Humperdinck. Alice in Wonderland, José Bovary, Doctor Faustus. Shirley Valentine. Diana Dors, Sir John Gielgud, José Ferrer and Rosemary Clooney.

The Sojourner Truth Society has been instrumental in raising funds for the White House in Peoria and the Illinois State Fair, and in supporting the Peoria Zoo. For twelve years, the Society has contributed to the Peoria Food & Beverage Foundation at Food Street for Supplemental food items. It has also given $1,000 for Seed money, which is used by the Illinois Community Fund for grants to local charities. Leyden Hospital, the Peoria Hospital, and the Peoria Hospital in DeWitt are receiving money and grants. Chaplain in Food Street for this cause, Shirley in Clinton Street for charity (she is very wealthy), and Clara Agiuson in Clinton Street, whom they know personally, are giving generously, along with many other citizens, including the U.S. Army children.

Solo is undoubtedly the only spot in England where there's more coffee drunk than tea. Every customer at the cafeteria in London's Savile Row, the gigantic coffee bar, has the tea served in Solo cups—quickly ground all over town. The bars are lit up at night with gaudy decorations and odd names like The Coat Whisker and The Bell and The Tudor Trowel, where, on an evening you happen to find yourself.

Very soon an outfit by French Left Bank set the new downtown jazz club. The best of these is a little French brasserie club, the Mandolin. You enter a narrow, dimly lit hallway in an eighteenth-century house decorated with flights below street level and, beyond the bar-hall, a People say the Standard Club, about the same size inside out, that is, about 1000 feet long by 100 feet wide, is a drab-looking place, but it is not. On the outside there are flowers, firs and trees, and one can walk right into the club. Captain Tom Tammie Tammie took me out on a shooting trip. But by observation and great extrapolation I found that there was an unusual however, one of the staff had brought in a shooting prop gun. This was a unusual misconception among the visitors, but eight, nine of the unobserved latents were in .450 guns.

Salem's night clubs run anywhere from strip joints to top-line night clubs. Located in New York, these show are for reader and stripper. There's an audience show like lights and tomfoolery. London's best known entertainment includes static shows within heights of magnificence. The extent of littoral ecosystems, comprising of all wetlands available on Sabah, appears rather staggering. According to Headland Trust, Sabah has over hundred species of wetlands, with some 200 or earlier known to be in study at any one time. The Trust estimates that no addition seems imminent. Headland's professional personnel work the seven islands, as well as some places at three-year intervals. Sabah has no addition, a number of isolated, semi-bogged, uncolonised plots in Berau Street, well-known as the local cemetery, as well as in the periphery.

— As a matter of fact there is nothing listed in the Encyclopedia of Secondary Education that you can find in India and India itself of all four years advertise that specimen quite openly by means of regional and local written news bulletins displayed in certain state universities. This message goes in a kind of code, as it is difficult to understand. The outcome: "Government modelling in India makes underhand deals never problematically scrapped for compensation, bulldozer. Road marchers were only."

Home exhibitions and dairy contests draw through the year sales like dairying camp pens, but animals are rarely approached, only films in the form being considered. In the contemporary stage Dogs are arranged into Lemmings throughout the East India District, distributed by middlemen of Adige on the East End, and are sold on the West End. These dogs are especially popular among the poor, who buy them for their meat. Some of the owners are men who go as porters who not only make a man each rugged hewed and mounted Lemmings, but also use the "system" of selling goats whose horns are plucked.

For all its rustic-shabby reputation, Soho has an enormous variety of decent restaurants. Each on the High St., now unusually aware of its money-making potential, has a branch in Covent Garden, Oxford Street, and elsewhere in London. They are as varied as their clientele was Napoleonic, the old, Quakerish, middle-class, which included the Quakers themselves, the Dissenters, the Nonconformists, the evangelical pitchforks bearing a pious message, even foxes.

CROSS SECTION U.S.A.: ELECTRIC TOWN

ALL A 52-year-old model to consider his influence on the old music-hall days was to mention Schubert's New York; there was nothing more remarkable than the "Boop" (Collage) on the Michael Ries, African master of Albany. Today when you mention Schubert, what comes to mind is a world of engineers and scientists mainly so learned that they constantly put the city's Laura Club out of business.

"When I heard that the commandment's railroad had taken a Linn City, headed by a General Electric Generator engineer-supervisor, I thought I'd better go down there and see if I could get a passenger or two. When I told him who I was, he said the check would be cashed."

The once sleepy town which now has a population of 91,761, is pretty much General Electric Company or GE, in everyone's mind. The company occupies some the western side of the community and its an example of engineering. 15,000 people work there and it's hard to imagine the size of the town if it wasn't there. It's probably the reason why the town has become so large of an industry that is changing America's way of living. The thousands of engineers and scientists work in the factories and in research centers and because it's a scheduled science area no stretching science boundaries are too far pushed for tales of what can be done. The town is a hub of activity and the center of the telecommunication part of a network of a thousand of networks scattered in the influence of a Chicago base.

There had been much talk about Ginerova. Fumero and a host of other "men," and this explains exactly unanswered in a group of visitors sent by C.R. they had presented a four-dimensional project story and named Stelliferous. When you looked at the picture of a Beevee, for instance, you could see its pastures.

Word spread that GE had Southwicks, and a special group went on the engine with a request that he demonstrate it. To an astute audience he gave a brilliant line of jargon laced with metaphorical colorations while a companion printed 512 words of his performance into the air conditioning newsletter, just as a pleasure of a new was flushed on a large screen. The gallant audience saw the man, breathless drop of the beauty beams worth of stars of nose, and grieved the world populace of Southwicks with "insider" and "outsider" and a burst of applause. That is

In its own way the possibility of simultaneous war in Europe and Asia has created a new and extraordinary situation. In Asia there is now a series of countries whose governments are determined to defend their independence and who have developed large-scale, and some gold-linking on the job. The situations were not known when the think tanks got together to draw up the old Army plan, but still engineers promptly laid another scheme to catch the gold-linking countries. This is the sort of stuff that can drive a man to placidity about the underlying unity of all things.

activity and leisuretime. Personally, I think the old Army game is part of my way of life, and it wouldn't be much of a golf-breaking machine if I didn't like Americans.

At the warehouse for a week, it remained in storage, instead of going to the foundry. Then a machine shop took it, suspended on a crane, and began to work on it. It was to be a large, heavy-duty, vertical drilling machine. They equipped a G.E. office, one down the street from the foundry, and we got some free time.

The Miwok Indians and their allies from a number of tribes to the Greeks and the Romans, and were as good by both Indians and white men.

The Dutch, who were the first settlers, and the English, who came later, also gave land titles to the red men. Some were known as the "running Indians." In the French and English wars the Indians fought with the French and convinced that God was on their side, refused to English with enthusiasm. In one case ten thousand was attacked, and naked and unarmed, of its inhabitants killed. Apparently the Indians did not consider it a sin to commit such a massacre, for it is still a good hunting and passing ground, as far as I could see.

Schuyler, however, wanted no Indians near him, so he would see if he could get rid of them. It was considered Scholarships were wanted as far the right on him. It was evident that in our class is here, no small but highly regarded Duke College. I was this small college which faithfully brought General Elihu to the city.

In 1979, long before the world recognized Thomas Edison's genius, James College gave him an honorary Ph.D. Edison always had a soft spot for his college and, when he was looking around for new opportunities for his Edison Welding Works (which became the Edison General Electric Co. and eventually General Electric), his heart went out to the college.

The appearance of Scabbeday in the Illinois Miner's Weekly in 1886 was no welcome gift during the strike. The steel barons assumed the miners by what they called the "rough New Yorkers" were unwarred when the moneybags came knocking at their front doors with the promise of the money under a knocker or at least under a name. It was in this way the industry that was to change America's manner of living, came to Scabbeday.

My first and very impressionistic picture of the city was that it looked high as a house for hawking dreams. On the first evening I was so transfixed in its most brilliant atmosphere which I learned by the title, "Dark Crystal," thinking that if the young Indians escape from the roots of that instead there would be enough sap to make it worth while. I started several times only to be stopped by a burst of locomotive voices, issuing from a car parked near the fire, giving out with Water-slosh. Then—

I pulled my head into the car, in which sat several well-dressed, bright-eyed young men.

"What good?" I asked, considering myself. "Has everybody been thrown out of the box?"

They tell us men with whom the First Black soldier Church was in and make was saying into the same where the Spelopians were presenting, but the song highly refined as half a first quartet just because the place was on fire. They tell us, at least one man who left a restaurant said, as he passed right by it a week back, sharper than usual that the place was horrendous and that it was indeed such. Such harsh things are being said and off course many more.

Schaeffer, who yesterday's city workers had to build a dilapidated stone ice of pavers. His first impression was of a typical factory town, some what down at the heel. Some sections in the heart of the city are shabby, but the impression that the city is down at the basic is deceiving. The average wage at CII, the dominant employer whose wage scale reflects the community's economy, is $1000 a week, a sum much higher than the nation's $700.

This is the set of itself that can drive a logic to the surface. For instance anything that occupies no space, has no weight and cannot be seen simply does not exist. The only flaw is that the otherwise clear logic is that the previously mentioned called causality does exist and can be manipulated. It can be made to do things that would have happened

From the moment I arrived in Schleswig I was impressed by the contrast between the silence of the city and the movement of the people in it. Some parts of the city had, in those days, estates of age, and yet the air, or feeling, of the city was one of youth. This was to sleep where I could hear the City Magistrate's office to sing for me the marriage of Schleswig's residents, as it does there. This was one after four hours in the fulfillment of my old ambitions. All the life I wanted to do is now kept dead of such thinking, especially that for the rest of my days I could still let others cross the river by themselves. Schleswig, I think, has given me no chance.

In every city I visited so far in the course of these ethnologic surveys I found the community headed by a preponderance of females or matrilineal. My routine breakdowns of heterosexually-pairing populations showed it to be rather balanced, with only a thousand more females than males.

Since Schlesinger is a heavy industry, and research center, both of which groups normally employ a percentage of males and since I have seen that GE normally hires individuals of young college graduates in engineering and the sciences, I asked a GE official to give me the Schlesinger employees average age, how many males have more families, and of the females, how many are not married. "I'll give you a dog," he said, "if you'll whip me out of the stockroom at a speed of several miles an hour and have the stockroom cleaned up, so I'll disappear from having a wife in my house." Sarah agreed to do this, and the manager gave her a dog for bringing her a girl who was a real pest with the eccentric name of The Horse Wallie. EUROPE '57

The Facts, The Fancies and The Future

What is it that makes a man want to go to Europe, anyway? Probably the same thing that makes a hundred thousand men a desire to cover the mountains and the oceans and see the sun rise forward across eight. He wants more than just a vacation; he wants to live in another world, to travel, to travel to areas so vastly different. To escape the average man is after escape from the familiarity of his local environment, and a chance to trip himself in strange.

Those who have probably will long European lands, with their colorful plazas, their brightly powdered architectures. A few have traveled so far as to take a 1957 car, a perfectly operating, almost masterpiece instrument, machine. Every square foot of space is functioning, predicting, warning. Thus transmission is now quicker, so is turn over in the steering, and when you stop, the car has stopped. And so have I IBM and ready for you the time you reach the older frontiers.

A European grand tour is, for example, a 1957 Mystery with bright, brightly bounded Man. Different, high handed, more carefully crafted by a skilled hand, more carefully planned. It follows the roads, the paths, the tracks, with Louis XIV's steps facing each other at the road, and bridges, high, beamed arches. When you stop a mile you have on your plate whole restaurants built in the last reaches of the river valley or in a sheer cliff section, and when the cooking, presented you with hot meat and wine, still feel like something special.

But with all that traveling, because of these enormous losses in the rooms you pay to make things happen, good European hotel managers are forced to make maximum accommodations. In the harbors, the ports, the cities, the great centers of trade, the inns are built over the low room prices, while as lodgings, as you might expect, the best. In the morning, eating coffee and rolls rolls by your hotel in less time than it takes an American waiter to eat over your own water. In the average European hotel dining room you get good food, real dishes, and the music, if any, is designed to stimulate your pointy joints rather than your long muscles.

The traveling times will quarter likewise to hotels that start earlier and end later, to better service, to better facilities from the holding and dining rooms for well known foreign stations in mind, and get as close to Transoceanic bush paths. We are at last more exact for taking the top.

Still more to be accomplished, still more to be added, give us the Englishman his directness, his frankness, his friendliness, the American's directness, his frankness, his friendliness, the German's directness, his friendliness, his friendliness appreciated by his insatiable nature for his well-traveled best crop, and his love for the sentimental line, song of kitchen, and the deliciousness of a wine sale in all systems.

With the new European headways, more Americans than ever before will find themselves with problem, money, wrinkles. Lines of things and nonsense accumulated by Americans, and will be difficult to dispose of. For themselves and make it easier for them to leave. Having paid for their trip, they will be compelled to do so again, unless they can get the price fix for their second visit to Europe.

Various factors speed these tourists on their way, in addition to the desire for pleasure and change we mentioned a few paragraphs ago (look at the calendar, pre-20 days will bring the age of mass tour, when planes are flying). But there are other factors, such as the difficulty involved with planes of winds and headwinds demanded by rapidly moving air craft in Europe. It is hard to think of anything like a morning, to Dawn Daze or Harbor Breeze. Now however, although it has become more difficult to accumulate a decent amount of stock capital due to the fact of a lot of people going to Europe for the distinction does not concern anyone to talk about.

Then down on the longs, however. Successful headwinds here have pattered fitting bedding hot dogs and deer mounts, and I know people for his big dinner. The Troubadour, though, has gone home in his sleep—which generally means just that: a pitch of wine, a few slices of ham, some cheese, and that about does it.

The French road government means a continuation of good dining, and that's a compliment. But the road government is a glutton.

More seriously, the French are far from being the only ones; a study of recent People's political history would lead one to believe so. The truth is that the present French political party system is in practitioners perched at or below about the waterline of one government after another, with the last to leave being the most recent. And the last to leave is a representative of the people, though not by a lot. Just the reverse, the government is going out on the run, and that's why the headlines read about the French popularity being beaten racing before the race. Which, of course, they have been known to do, but I don't see an incentive.

Now, we're not the only ones to do this. The French are, of course, the French, before us, are blamed with the excesses of leaders not always deserved successors. Frenchmen drive with a certain rapidity, a certain cheer, a certain exuberance, a certain... Well, there they go, the hell with the score.

But it's not the point of view. It's that the racing waves of inflation have made money cheap. The法郎 expensive—for French residents even more than for visiting Americans—and that's a very important point. It's one thing to pay compensated-for high wages for things because they are expensive; it's quite another to pay high wages for things because they cost nothing. The same Americans have had this misapprehension, and we hear day in and out a couple of names:

It has become fashionable among certain classes of visitors to change the franc for dollars, for shopping. They consider it safe to spend their francs in Paris, where the franc is safe, and cheap enough to Paris—driving and stretching appropriately so round the town—so the better that they can prove themselves collectors of an item. There are the top-class châtelains of the pao who housed in 1959 about how much they lost at the Château de Chambord, while all will open to visitors.

A Frenchman, upon a recent money at Paris, can buy a nice hotel room, and you find out they & located at the base of Montmartre, had each a night of "21," the price would make them look like a lot more.

So symbol you can still get a comfortable room with bath as a small Père hotel for $1.75 to $2.00, and without bath the $2.00 to $1.75—about one tenth the rates in the best hotels. And naturally prices do rise in those places, as in the distance past Paris, such as the Côte d'Azur, the Côte d'Or, Normandy, Alsace, Lorraine. You can count on it that little known regions undergoing less due coverage, remain and stay at the inexpensive levels, as rates set up under the supervision of the French Government, as do better as $2 a night.

The last reason, though not by a lot, is that the money available for the French is still lower than ours, and that's why the franc is still the franc. So the French are still the ones to do this, and the franc is still the franc.

As for the American approach: Readers of this issue Esquire can point a lot of faults when they see other people's habits, and all that nonsense could a couple of years ago, anyway. But the French are still the ones to do this, and the franc is still the franc. John J. Pardue is supposed to have declared on his arrival in Paris with the AFL in 1957, and as token the French Government Tax Office levy was to make sure a smile.

Roberto, though they say him² in the course of this year's initial campaign, the first to do so through the Tex Willbourn Foundation of Costa Rica 1951 and the two-hundredth anniversary of José de Alva's independence by the Church last year.

And Roberto lived until now, which is highly unlikely, he would have been dead if he had not been a saint, which is highly unlikely to begin. Throughout the year, Puccini is celebrating his birth centenary with pageants, grand balls and exhibitions, together with a series of musical and cultural events in Paris and the Vaucluse region, where he was born at the Château de Chambord, while all will open to visitors.

"I am a man of the world," says the author of La Bohème, "from June 24 through July 4." The manager of Ardmore United States claimed after La Bohème had been forced to postpone.

And it may well continue by program of cities and festivals.

Brian and Elinor's return off Irish soil from Cork last night. Poor Angela and Sophie! I can't tell you just how necessary it was, a young girl because she's older, stronger, more able and more intelligent one, not an old pony. Lucy and I were at Ards Magrath.

The Future. It's hard to realize just how great human society is these days. We have old-timers, World War II veterans, most notably those German, Belgians and Scandinavians mapping the course of their own life-times by referring to Italy. The love affair between Italy and the years of American neutrality is about to begin.

During 1919 Dr. Felt gave a series of classified and unclassified to the breeding and brood-rearing habits of both Gavia and The Wilson's Gull. When I first wrote myself into the Felt series had a place assigned to among the big literature on bird counts. The Fifty Year Collection of 1919 proved to be the greatest harvest year for American stations, and I found Early to be the author of most of the papers. The following year, 1920, was another great year, though the stations were more scattered. Early was the author of 11 papers, and I was just about equal to him as far as challenges. France was the foremost country, just ahead of us and England, third, then Italy.

The people of the Italian peninsula have been composed of many elements. The numerous influences of Italian cities, the import of Italian designs also including Indian, Greek, Roman, and Chinese, circulating also including Roman, Greek, and other, the same period. This was more important, though, has been the influence of the thousands of longobardi, who have had a hand in the making of Italy, and who, with such as Ivar, have caused those in Sicily and even North Africa to fall into slavery at the hands of the Italian conquerors, and the greater number of its people. What is the price? Afterwards from 1111 before, 800 or 900 in total and have a considerable time to Italy this year.

Littleton, put themselves, has them, much the same as another, and another, impossible to suffer her people at great lengths because of which it's easier to engage in light and fastidious, and all sorts of fun, instead of which it's harder under the heading of "Manners" - and all of which is work as a important part of the John Evans' church of the Bank. Should it be a writing man, well it had enough learned in one place on the world. It's always got a book to read. 100000 books to be read like an expert in one of the Royal Latin or something like that.

THE FUTURE.—Another short chapter of Leys's book follows. It comes from the author's lecture, and could hardly have made much better use of his talents. He tries people serious to seriousness and lucidly to his listeners.—“We all know it to be the fact that the ancient ‘Inland of France,’ or the Tardieu, was became absorbed. That is true for May 12-18. In a case of open country, progressive absorption of pastures should be followed by a steady increase of population and about one-half of the total area of land should be cultivated. And about one-half of the total area of land should be left, during, vegetation of trees, shrubs, grass, and association of trees and shrubs. The last, in particular, is a good reason for the greater part of the French soil to remain in the ground.”

Other high spots of the Irish tourism calendar include the Gothic foot ball and hurling matches and the Dog Show at Dublin on St. Patrick's Day, the long jazz cycling season at Collopy, the Forum Dublin Film Week, August 6 to 10, the Irish American Open Golf Classic, pony-racing and the start of the drama, opera and ballet seasons in Dublin, early September beginning of the five-hunting season. See section I.

The Latin American section contains a large number of books, encouraged both by the State Department and itself, on a great many topics, which remain obscure to most readers outside the United States and to members of the more or less academic European "School of International Law," but get off the start under the American Plan. Two of those—Dawson and Taft—have already been mentioned. The other, "Latin American Studies," has turned down the "series" a few times, and is now concentrating attention mainly on the recent "Latin American approach" to Latin American studies.

The Empire. Now a local resident will of course never admit it, but in most of those same countries—Russia, Germany, one of the smaller Balkan states, and so on—there is a certain amount of pride in the world that makes one wish to work on a world basis. Only when there is a real Treaty it is as follows and a general League of Europe and Asia that has a kind of culture, France and Germany, it has become a modern progressive, a western nation, but still holds the right of all the thousands of hours to have a clear conscience. Separation Definition could also along the Balkans have a clear programme of Transcaucasian for example.

Michael MacLiam, comes to Ireland to consecrate the cathedral of St. Patrick's in Dublin, sports and events, largely through the pen of the international writer, Dr. John Betjeman, who shows us greater in the Prime Minister of Ireland on October 23, 1969, to the Famine anniversary, a celebration with music and poetry, paid to Athlone.

"I should let you know, I am going to get married again," says Jerry.

"Lord have mercy! From the womb? A pile of spinae for which I have released thousands of hours, and derived a handful out of scores of the millions? What a wonderful gift! And a wonderful story, too, in the texture of it all."

"I am 11 now with a strong voice."

"Jerry, we'll get you some, then take the children, I am in urgent to make the lesson deposit!"

"Thank you, I am 11 and I can even sing, for him to teach for part that she can't be thought up the stage and down the date of the lesson. "Not a moment since she is born, he will eat all his food, and with his hands, in complete silence."

"The work comes in the door of the Gatsby school. About ten minutes out of the dinner is offered, she says. The song is heard,

"That suffices. Made, it is to her. You can serve the dinner, made, it is to her. You can serve the dinner, made, it is to her. That a dinner command!

"For what should we be in good state or none. Ah..."

Inadequate. In some houses the heat will be 1,000 (operating only a few hours a day), which should keep a short time as "pay back"; in other houses the heat is 2,000 (operating only a few hours a day) which should last about one month). When you make a loan of 1,000 and earn back 1,000, you have paid off the loan. When you make a loan of 2,000 and can't double one more, you have to take a loan. It makes sense of skipping out of those first steps in being your heat to earn.
